It's Never Too Late

By Steve Hamblin, Clinton Building Official

After recent articles addressing when building permits are required, our office has received a number of calls from concerned property owners indicating that they have already started a home project without a permit. One of their concerns is that they were afraid of a penalty charge for getting started prior to a permit being issued.

The goal of the building division is to ensure a safe, code compliant structure. The city will not penalize any property owner for being honest enough to contact us if they were not aware of the permit process. However, if the work is being done by a licensed contractor, the city may penalize the contractor for ignoring the permit process as opposed to complying with it.

Remember, installation or replacement of any type of water heater, furnace or A/C requires a building permit as well as any modification to your homes framing, plumbing, mechanical or electrical systems. Once again, the building inspectors goal is not to "catch you" making a mistake, but to provide a second set of eyes to ensure that the work done is both safe and code compliant.

By not obtaining a building permit, you may very well provide your insurance company with the justification they need to deny a claim on damage to that portion of your home completed without a building permit. As always, if you need the help of a contractor with your home project, make sure they are licensed with the State of Utah and that they have obtained a permit.
